Effect of heat treatment (50 degrees C, 60 min) on the pectin polymer was studied using pectin from three different citrus fruits. At lower concentrations of pectin, there was no significant loss of turbidity or decrease in viscosity. However, at higher concentrations, pectin from orange and grapefruit was degraded and the amount of oligosaccharide degraded was much higher than that degraded from lemon. The enzymatic de-esterification of pectin from orange and grapefruit resulted in the appearance of a new product on HPLC, which was not present in the native pectin of lemon. The results indicate that pectin from different citrus fruits differ in their susceptibility to heat and the degree of degradation of pectin depends on the concentration of pectin. bff6bb2d33
