Chrome Cleanup Tool is a small application designed to clean Chrome in a number of ways. Most of the work it does is either to remove old files or identify files that can be deleted. In addition to that, it also provides a means for removing certain toolbars and extensions, as well as uninstalling programs that have been installed in the past and may not have been uninstalled properly. Some of the results that may show up when running the tool are shown in the image below. Depending on the OS that you are running, the tool will prompt you to reboot the system to complete some of the changes that it makes. After that, Chrome will be reset to its default settings and any unwanted applications or settings will be removed. As can be seen in the image above, the tool can show a list of all applications that have been installed on your Chrome. The list will be displayed in a tab on its own, but users will be able to click on a program to view the details of its installation and removal details. If you have any trouble using the tool, you can always refer to our article on how to install and use Chrome Cleanup Tool. When evaluating the effects of environmental interventions in large population-based field studies, the reliability of the electrocardiographic (ECG) measures need to be considered. Our aim was to develop a robust method for estimating the reliability of ECG measurements obtained during a limited battery of tests in a large field study. A random subset of the population was selected for ECG assessment during three interviews: anthropometry and health (T0), blood pressure measurement (T1), and 24-h ECG measurements (T2). The three assessments were performed on a single day at T0 and T1, and on separate days at T2. The ECG measurements from T0 to T1 and from T1 to T2 were each categorized into major or minor arrhythmia groups. Arrhythmia groups were matched across interview days. Individuals with continuous arrhythmia during at least one of the interviews, but not classified as affected, were considered to be rejected from analysis (major arrhythmia group: n = 395; minor arrhythmia group: n = 407). Distributions of major arrhythmia prevalence and of prevalence of the same individual arrhythmia at T0, T1, and T2 were generally even across interview days. The prevalence of major arrhythmias that were continuous at two or more interview days ranged from 41.6 (diastolic blood pressure) to 81.6% (heart rate). The prevalence of major arrhythmia that was continuous at all three interview days ranged from 26.4% (heart rate) to 45.7% (blood pressure). The concurrent agreement for continuous arrhythmia between T0 and T1 was 0.87 (95% CI: 0.84-0.89). The corresponding agreement between T1 and T2 was 0.82 (0.81-0.83). The prevalence of major arrhythmia that was continuous at two or more interview days was generally similar between single- and dual-inter
