The present invention particularly relates to low-flow electrophoretic separations. 2. Description of the Related Art Electrophoretic separations are used in many applications. For example, in medical diagnostics, blood is commonly separated into its components, and these components are analyzed to assist in the diagnosis and treatment of disease. Microcapillary electrophoresis (MCE) is an analytical technique where separation and analysis of samples, such as proteins, nucleic acids, or cells, can be performed in capillaries less than two hundred microns in diameter. The small inner diameter of a capillary, typically about 75 to about 200 microns, results in high electroosmotic flow, which is the flow of a fluid in a capillary due to an electric field applied across the capillary. Electroosmotic flow results in convection inside the capillary. A primary difference between MCE and high performance liquid chromatography (HPLC) is that MCE provides little to no pressure, while HPLC provides high to ultra high pressure. In HPLC, the sample to be analyzed is injected into the flow of a low conductivity buffer under high pressure. As the flow enters the high conductivity buffer, the buffer pushes the sample toward the low conductivity buffer. In capillary electrophoresis, the sample to be analyzed flows through a capillary in which a voltage is applied along the length of the capillary, typically in the range of about 5 kV to about 100 kV. The voltage applied causes sample materials to move in the electrophoretic separation. In order to provide a quantitative analysis of the
