11 Mar 2015 I'm not sure if there are many other people out there like me who make mods to their very own PC games, making them. Going back to the original game and that. Total War: Shogun 2 - Emperor Edition is a release for the PC, Mac and Linux.. War is bigger than the sum of its parts, and the Imperials' ability to fight on the Total War games on Steam is coming to an end. Jul 10, 2016 Â· Launch your Planes in Total War: Rome II. This extension allows you to add in the few.Q: Passing in multiple onchange event handlers What is the difference between these onchange event handlers? function showTime() { document.getElementById("showtime").innerHTML = this.value } function showTime() { document.getElementById("showtime").innerHTML = this.value } What if there is more elements? How do you call the.innerHTML on multiple elements? document.getElementsByClassName("showtime")[0].innerHTML = this.value A: In a nutshell, in your code, the first one is just assigning a value to the "showtime" element while the second one is calling a function showTime with no parameters. In short, the first one is just setting the HTML value of a DOM element while the second one is a function. Documentation about "this" in JS When the function is called, the value of this will be whatever the value of this was when the function was defined. In the case of function(this, that) calls, the value of this will be the DOM element corresponding to that, and the value of that will be undefined. When to use a function? When you want to pass an argument. The function always returns a value, but in the case of getElementById() it won't return anything. In other words, the function would make more sense in that example: function showTime(element) { if(element) element.innerHTML = this.value; } And you would call it like this: function showTime() { var element = document.getElementById("showtime"); showTime(element); } Which is more or less
