LONDON (Thomson Reuters Foundation) - Women from war-torn regions are suffering so much from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) that their unborn children are up to nine times more likely to be born with birth defects, British researchers said on Thursday. The study, conducted by researchers at King's College London and University College London, showed that mothers exposed to conditions in war or conflict suffered stress levels as high as four-to-five times those of people who had experienced armed violence but were not exposed to war conditions. Women who were exposed to PTSD in their homes, schools, hospitals or workplaces were more likely to have children with congenital malformations such as deformities of the limbs, heart or brain than those who had not been exposed to war but were traumatised by violence. "Children with birth defects are thought to be at greater risk of mental health problems later in life," said Dr. Catherine Allsopp, a senior lecturer in social psychiatry at King's College London. "This study shows an increased risk of mental ill health for those born to women who
