Serial cross-sectional imaging of the spine: radiography, CT, and MRI. Computed tomography (CT), as well as magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), are the preferred imaging modalities for the assessment of acute traumatic vertebral body fractures. Combined radiography and CT is still considered the standard imaging modality for spinal trauma at the authors' institution. The authors assessed the role of conventional radiography, CT, and MRI as diagnostic tools in the assessment of traumatic vertebral body fractures. Radiographs, CT, and MRI scans in 116 patients with 136 acute, traumatic fractures of the spine were retrospectively reviewed. The data on fracture type, extent, and type of associated injuries were recorded. The number of fractures per patient and the time interval between radiographs and CT were noted. The authors assessed the number of fractures not detected by X-ray, CT, and MRI. In addition, the authors assessed the number of fractures demonstrated on one or more than on one imaging modality and compared this number to the number of additional fractures demonstrated on CT with those confirmed with the help of MRI. Forty-one fractures in 35 patients were not detected by plain radiography, which demonstrated fracture in 95% of the cases. Fractures not detected by CT included 56 vertebral body fractures (32%), 41 fractures of the posterior elements (23%), and 14 pedicle fractures (8%). MRI additionally demonstrated fracture in 10% of the cases missed
