I have a function that needs to loop over a list and print all the characters. What I want is to have the function work recursively, so it will first check the first item and then, if the first is not an even number, recursively check the second item. If the list is completely iterated, it would run out of stack space for a big list. Is there a way to do this? I was thinking of using a return statement, but I was wondering if theres a more compact and recursive way to write this. A: A simple recursive list-traversing version of fvck would help: def fvck(lst, i=0): if i+1 == len(lst): print "".join(lst) else: print lst[i]+fvck(lst, i+1) Q: What is a strategy for pre-planning for the next major release of Mac OS X? I'm looking for a strategy to plan ahead for OS X 10.9, specifically which features I'd like to add and how to time them. Is there a plan as to how the Mac team will plan for 10.9 and go about it? A: Apple encourages developers to start at least two years before an upcoming release by testing compatibility with it and writing demo apps. For example, the end of 2012 was targeted for Snow Leopard, though the last betas were released in April 2011. The current release is Mountain Lion, which was released to developers and beta testers in June of 2011. By the date for the public release of OS X 10.9 (which, BTW, is not "the next major release of Mac OS X", whatever that would mean), we'll almost certainly have a beta. I would assume that Apple
