0.5 vMix Pro 5 free complete Cracked setup for windows. Download Now!In my final days of my year as an assistant secretary of labor, I've been flooded with calls and emails that chronicle what's been taking place for the past two years: a relentless effort to change the way the federal government will regulate work and workplace safety. You can read the stories behind these urgent developments in the Labor Department's rulemaking and in the lives of workers and communities where hazards take a toll. You can also read about an experiment that has been conducted in several cities over the past two years that has enabled workers to discover what's in their drinking water. The consumption of contaminated water is the most preventable cause of illness in the United States, yet it can go undetected because it doesn't result in obvious physical symptoms or a contagious infection. The water crisis is of particular concern to children, who can be exposed to high levels of toxins through their drinking water for years before any symptoms become apparent. Water fluoridation emerged as the most effective way to eliminate tooth decay, but few realize that fluoride-contaminated water, once used as a public health measure, is now linked to serious health effects including endocrine disruption, thyroid and bone problems, and cancer. I am proud to say that, as a result of the Obama administration's efforts, more than 99.7 percent of public water systems have been examined and fluoridated, and the federal government has removed thousands of toxic substances from the environment. Yet the ongoing threat of public health emergencies, and the tragic deaths and injuries they cause, can be detected in our drinking water. You don't need to look for outbreaks of Legionnaires' disease or even lead-contaminated drinking water. Just look for the many indicators of water contamination that exist in every community. As soon as we see these hidden warnings, we can take action – as you see from the San Diego Water Utilities finding over two dozen cancer clusters in some neighborhoods. The scientific research on water toxicity points to certain risk levels. And though the EPA has finally published its “action level,” the agency's own data suggest that contaminated drinking water is much more common than the public knows. Today, the water resources of our nation are so contaminated that the Environmental Protection Agency has declined to set an “action level” for 6d1f23a050
