Gadolinium-based contrast agents: mechanisms, normal biodistribution, and effect on imaging in the CNS. Gadolinium-based contrast agents (GBCAs) have been used to perform magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the brain since the 1980s. However, since the mid-1990s, important reports on nephrogenic systemic fibrosis have raised concerns regarding the safety of these agents. This article reviews the current understanding of the mechanisms of GBCA toxicity, the reported causes of renal injury with subsequent contrast material nephrotoxicity, and the relevant physiologic and metabolic changes observed in patients during and after MRI. Furthermore, this review discusses the possible role of GBCA contrast enhancement in MRI for the diagnosis of central nervous system disorders, specifically multiple sclerosis and brain tumors. Finally, the article summarizes and discusses the possible effects of GBCAs on imaging with GBCA-enhanced MRI of the CNS.
