... This morning Ashot and Leva woke up before anyone else. The sun was already shining with might and main, but the sky was still covered with clouds. The boys got dressed and left the house. A morning in the south is the most beautiful thing that can be. Even in cloudy weather, the sky here is always transparent and clear. And today it, like the sea, was pale blue. Not a single cloud! Everything around was sun-drenched, sparkling, sparkling. The sea looked like frozen glass. The boys stood and admired the sea, then, holding hands, ran towards it.

Assessment of the microenvironment at the solid/liquid interface of poorly soluble drugs by the liquid-scintillation counter method. An elementary approach to the study of the crystallization of poorly soluble drugs in aqueous solutions is described. The amount of drug deposited on the solid/liquid interface of saturated aqueous solutions was determined by using the liquid-scintillation counter method. The amounts of phenylbutazone and ofloxacin, two poorly soluble drugs with different crystal structures, were measured. The results obtained are discussed in terms of the physical characteristics of drugs and of the crystal structure of drug aggregates, and the theoretical parameters based on the size of solid particles and the size of the crystal in the solid/liquid interface are examined. The liquid-scintillation counter method proved to be very effective in the determination of the interfacial area and of the local concentration of the dissolved molecules. The incorporation of the total adsorbed mass of drug in a control curve representative of every studied sample made it possible to compare the drug concentrations at the interface as they varied within the samples, in a sample-to-sample basis, as well as to determine the drug concentration at the interface in individual cases.

It is suggested that the liquid-scintillation counter method may serve to evaluate the microenvironment of drug crystals in aqueous systems and to provide control parameters for the fabrication of new types of drug products.

1980s in Ireland This is a timeline of Irish history in the 20th century. 1900s - 1918 - Ireland becomes a separate state within the United Kingdom. 1922 - Irish War of Independence - Irish Civil War 1923 - Treaty of Lausanne allows the emergence of a free Republic of Ireland after a new constitution is written. 1927 - Oireachtas establishes Special Powers Bill to deal with dissident members of the IRA (Irish Republican Army) 1932 - Ireland is granted limited home rule by the United Kingdom, the first step in the eventual creation of the Irish Free State. 1932 - The lowest point in Irish history is reached with the Rape of The Brides. 1933 - Neutrality Pact between Germany and the Allies. 1937 - Fascist politics in Ireland are at a low ebb with the advent
