in 1965, he was charged with the rape of a young black girl in Los Angeles. While the charges were dropped, Baldwin faced a public trial that caused him to write about his concerns for the youth of America, and in particular, the growing violence in America. Though he was acquitted, he faced ridicule and anger. In 1966 he published his most famous work, The Fire Next Time, which was met with fierce opposition by white America and was classified as obscene by the Library of Congress. In the early 1970s, Baldwin moved to France, where he lived with his family, and continued to write and to advocate for human rights. His efforts at nonviolence were well known, and he helped found the Association in Defense of the Negro Child. He was diagnosed with liver cancer in 1980, and though he survived, it was a difficult time for him and his family. His wife, the children, and their friends and supporters supported him through this ordeal. Though he continued to fight for human rights, Baldwin struggled with his memories of the brutality and injustice he had witnessed as a child in Harlem, and he found himself haunted by the blacks he had met in Paris and their stories. So he set about to recover his own memories, and in Just Above My Head (1985), he created a complex and moving account of his life. It was at this time that he began to experiment with the written word again. His last book was a final attempt to prove his genius to the world. He completed three books in the span of less than four years, and they are all elegantly written and incisive commentary. He pays attention to the subtle and deliberate ways that racist institutions are embedded in the structures and systems of this nation. The dialectic between the personal and the historical is present in every chapter of this book. 5ec8ef588b
