for the purposes of this project, the health of a special needs child is defined as safe, healthy, and capable of learning. health and safety are interrelated; a safe environment will result in healthier children, who will in turn be better able to learn. because of a child's special needs, it is essential that health and safety be recognized as a comprehensive and interconnected responsibility that requires a holistic approach to development. in the case of a child with special needs, safety is not the primary responsibility of a child's parents or staff. rather, it falls on the health care provider, home care aide, or other individual with a primary responsibility for the child's safety. it is assumed, unless otherwise specified, that health care professionals and trained home care aids know the health and safety requirements for special needs children. it is reasonable to assume that the providers are comfortable with the proper procedures and the use of specialized equipment. however, there may be times when health care providers and trained home care aids feel that the health and safety requirements are not practical or practical enough. in these instances, the guidelines have made recommendations as to how the health and safety requirements could be modified or rewritten. the guidelines are intended to be a single source of reference for health and safety requirements for children with special needs in the united states. therefore, the guidelines are structured to cover only the main health and safety issues for children with special needs in the u.s.
