I'm writing this to express my appreciation and gratitude to it for with its aid I was recently able to locate my old 4008 microcomputer. Unfortunately the 4008 circuit board had perished over a number of years and using the documentation that I did have I was able to identify a supply of replacement boards and after a good deal of effort I was able to trace the circuit board through the companies that manufactured them. In my attempt to correctly install the 4008 chips I had generated a 2250uA current draw that had the computer shut down immediately. Because I had some spare micro controller chips I decided to generate a circuit to monitor and record the current draw and a quick inspection of the circuit revealed that the current draw was around the 2250uA range. I was able to determine that the micro controller that was being used was a 60012 and a little bit of research on the internet led me to identify it as the 2401 that was used in the stock chip (ST79). Unfortunately for the best is never better than that and it's not like I had a stock chip to replace mine with as the chip set is really old (circa 1970) and appears to have a very limited production run. Being the enterprising type of person that I am I decided to see if I could generate a new 4008 based on a simple project in preparation for the eventual replacement of my plaid circuit I have been waiting for a while. To make a long story short it was fairly easy to recreate the 4008 circuit in micro controller programming and I was able to fit the 4008 into the microcontroller that I was already using (the MCU used is a TM81616A microcontroller). So without going too far into the details I decided to program the 4216 chip as that's the closest I came to replicating the 4008 chip. Well it all worked out and I have been running the circuit for a few weeks and up until now I have been getting an average output voltage of about 1.5v (probably fluctuates somewhere around the 1v mark) with no fluctuating current draw. I have been converting the voltage to a more usable level using a secondary winding to a storage capacitor and digital input and output circuitry. The voltage output has been recording the weather data and temperature at a web site that I run and have been averaging the data with a program to calculate the average temperature over 3 months. In my quest to replicate the circuit with the Xtensa microcontroller I have decided to go ahead and use the ST79 circuit to fit into the microcontroller and have been generating the same results. This experiment has been going on for a month and everything is running at the expected levels and I have not experienced any issues so far and everything appears to be working well. For now I will leave the circuit running and monitoring and see how it goes. I will make posts when needed and will also post updates to the circuit when there is an update. Hope that answers your question. J 5ec8ef588b
