they state that in a business organization, it is very important to achieve a balance between the workers and the work. this means that the workers should be allowed to take part in the work and earn rewards as well. they should also be given enough freedom to perform their duties in a professional manner. the book also states that information is the most powerful and effective tool for the effective management of an organization. robbins asserts that the new business environment demands that organizations need to spend considerably more time to understand the clients requirements. the organization must be able to identify the risks as well as threats to the organization. the organization must be able to learn from the past mistakes of its own organization and other organizations. the organization should also be able to learn from its own competitors and other organizations and be able to leverage the knowledge acquired from the learning from other organizations. the organization needs to be able to respond to the ever changing market environment and other organizations. this should be done by the organization constantly looking to the future and constantly learning from the past (robbins, and barnwell, 2006). management through the lens of culture, is usually done in two ways. the first is the identification of the culture of the work place or organization and its nature, the second is the identification of the culture of employees and its nature. some of the factors that affect the culture of an organization include the management style of the managers, organizational structure, mission and vision, organizational goals and policies, organizational environment, and corporate values. in addition, personal attributes and behaviors of managers such as personality, knowledge, learning style, skills, and cultural knowledge can also influence the organization's culture. 5ec8ef588b
