bhakiyaraj would go on to make movies like paadumugam, which is widely considered as a failure of epic proportions. he did nothing but deride that movie and selva and whenever selva tried to defend his movies, he took on in a single comparison the movie that needed being defended. so if an immature individual like bhakiyaraj with ego to burn, who never had any patience to understand how film works, why not act like that with any normal guy like selva? selva chose to stop all association with bhakiyaraj and his work but hasn't ever said why. whatever it was, as time passed, bhakiyaraj became an alcoholic and also harboured some dark secrets. this resulted in a lot of rumours about him and his career. i find that the reason for the separation of selva and bhakiyaraj is very simple. after a series of release of movies which went unnoticed, selva decided that he would make movies only for he, whose name was his. this ambition coupled with the fact that his marriage became strained and his wife became a household joke, resulted in a lot of pressure on selva. he experienced the condition very well when he made athadhes, (which is often believed to be his best movie), he already had a reputation before this movie. therefore it had to be perfect and it had to live up to that reputation. at the time of that movie, there were two factors which brought selva to reality check. (1) the movie was not financially beneficial for the distributors. (2) bhakiyaraj was demanding a lot more money compared to what was been done by selva in the earlier movies (mostly directed and written by braj).

when compared to raindrops on roses, this movie seems like an experiment where the director chooses to keep everything as a loose concept, not really much on storyline, emotion is what the movie offers in its place. i mean, if you need a movie to show you how a concept behaves under stress then i wont call you a movie person my favorite bit is the beginning of the movie that was the most entertaining one and also the most disturbing for the girl who was in the middle of an ordeal that scared her. the scene was so realistic the emotions seemed to engulf and go beyond the two characters. would have made a great horror movie! i do not think arr can be said to be an in-born novelist. rather, he is a good storyteller and has so wonderfully shown how characters react and how story evolves. so while watching this movie, i was absorbed to the feel that each character reaction was on the money and the laughs were guttural. and the simplicity of the movie is what makes a strong message. almost like a documentary where you can identify the emotions going on in the face of the characters. give me a movie without any ado. and this one did just that. pretty amazing, thats what i felt while watching this movie, pretty amazing and without any clue about what was about to happen. this time my expectations were low, the guy is a pretty average goon, a pretty average drunk and just blah blah blah. but to my surprise, the movie surprised me, and told me that even in life we do not get it all straight. the way they show the first few days in the life of john, the way they depict our innate feelings, the way they show the culprits heart even without trying to throw a knife at him, the way they show his love for the girl. in the end, the movie shows us as how we are and shows us what our future has in store. 5ec8ef588b
