Sri Lanka's education system was designed to produce academically-oriented students who could be absorbed into large number of government and private companies, preferably those in the service sector. High school graduates are expected to get a job in the growing and demanding services sector. The private education sector was developed mainly by the service sector, and vocational education and training largely to prepare graduates for well-paid, well-regulated, highly-skilled jobs. After 10 years of working in a large company, we can not graduate as the average person unless we have a proper job. Whatever it is, the graduates are supposed to be submissive to the employers. They cannot demand their rights but they can be asked to work well, and to give the company a good return in return of the money paid for the education. Skills required for an engineering degree can be found in any big metropolitan city in the world and the graduates can work in many places outside Sri Lanka. Whatever the job may be. The quality of education and its academic orientation is not the main problem. So long as it is taught by sound and able teachers, and with use of computers, it should be able to provide any level of education to the young generation. The goal of the education system in Sri Lanka is that the society should learn to value and respect education and the teachers, whilst ensuring that students do not become too caught up in the pursuit of their academic degree, which should not become the sole focus of the student. Teaching should not be used to reinforce the class struggle as there is no such thing as workers paradise as the politicians are saying. Every worker should earn a living in a fair way, and not be forced to live in poverty.
