Janice Smith Organic Chemistry Solutions 3rd Edition Smith. Solution. Various media delivery systems can serve media content to media consuming (or client) devices over a network from a media server. In some cases, users may be able to select media items to consume. For example, a user may obtain some media items (e.g., movies) to consume from a content provider that provides a collection of media items. In some cases, a media item (e.g., a movie) can include a digital copy of the movie. For example, the digital copy can be presented (e.g., displayed) on a media consuming device (e.g., a television) to the user for consumption. In some cases, a user can watch a movie (e.g., in a home environment) using a set top box (STB) coupled to the user's television. For example, the user can select media items to consume (e.g., movies) from the STB, and can transmit (e.g., play) the selected media items to the user's television. However, in some cases, a user may desire to use the same media item (e.g., a movie) using a number of different media consuming devices (e.g., a media device at a home and a media device at a work). In some cases, the media item can be shared between a number of media consuming devices. For example, a number of media consuming devices (e.g., a STB at a home and a laptop at a work) can share the same digital copy of the movie. In some cases, the media item (e.g., a movie) can include multimedia content that can be viewed using a variety of different rendering engines (or client devices). The rendering engine can be responsible for rendering the multimedia content into a format that can be presented to a user. For example, the rendering engine can take the multimedia content (e.g., data in a
