Pixlr Editor on the left. One of the things that immediately struck me when I took the first dig though Pixlr Editor is how easy it's to jump from large images to smaller sources in the same image. Pixlr put this capability right into the software, and it's great for keeping work manageable and efficient. Plus, whatever raw files you shoot, you can import directly into the app. An important improvement to the Current Selection tool is that the rectangle can now be resized and positioned by dragging the corners. In the Batch Image Processor dialog, you can now choose to process the images in one or multiple files. Instead of opening its own version of Photoshop when reviewing a PSD file, Photoshop now uses a browser window, just like Sketch. Images in the Sketch view are backed up in the Photoshop documents, and annotating and applying tweaks can easily continue after a visit to the app. The Desktop Link feature for Mobile and Online allows you to send a link to the image to a specific e-mail address so that you can review it offline on your iPad. Linking an image is as easy as adding a URL in a file's metadata. Thanks to Adobe's new Browser Layer proposal, one of the most common desktop scenarios—sharing an image for which layers have been given to separate layers—is easier to manage in Sketch. Share for Review in Sketch is similar to Send for Review in Photoshop: A link is generated and sent to the recipient; if the file is saved and shared, any changes made by the recipient will automatically be noted by Sketch. Links and comments can be copied and pasted back into their originating file. There's no need to reestablish connections as you would in the future—users can continue to make changes and view changes in non-web-image contexts.

This conversion enhances the appearance of images and can be used on all layers, both protected and un-protected, in the document. The next release will also enhance the working speed of repetitive Photoshop actions. In the past, users have used actions to speed up the repetitive process of placing particular effects on images (the actions were just the shortcut to that particular process), but the actions have slowed down the speed and performance
