Q: Playback video in my application, captured by the camera, on default video player in Android I have a very simple application. In this app I take the video of the user's life through camera. I have no problems in capturing the video and getting the preview image of the camera. Now I want to play that video in my app. I am using the default video player for this purpose. But the problem is, I am getting the thumbnail of the video. How to give the source image to the video player? A: Well, once the video is captured and saved in the device internal memory, you will get the path of the video. Take that path and then use the following line to open the video, in a new activity. `Uri video = Uri.parse("file://" + path);` `VideoView videoView = (VideoView) findViewById(R.id.videoView);` `videoView.setVideoURI(video);` For more detailed information refer this link.

Five months ago, I took a job at a startup, and one of the things I was most excited about was the opportunity to work with Clojure (and JVM) at a more functional level. This was my first time using functional programming, and it was liberating to work in a paradigm that used immutable state. I found I was more productive than ever, and much of the code I wrote was more readable and concise. However, I didn't understand where this paradigm would lead me, and I often felt that the code I was writing was hard to follow. I had little experience with the language, and assumed that Clojure was similar to other functional languages, like Haskell. In this article, I will outline Clojure's style of functional programming, and explain why, despite its
