Parkinson's disease (PD) is the second most common neurodegenerative disease that leads to the loss of motor control and reduced motor capacity. Understanding the pathophysiology of PD requires a combination of clinical and pathological examinations. However, it is difficult to distinguish PD from other neurodegenerative diseases and vascular diseases with clinical examinations. Therefore, an accurate pathological diagnosis is essential to provide disease-specific therapies. In this issue of the Journal of Neurology, Fukuchi et al. [\[\[@b1-jmd-19044\]\]](#) report a PD patient with increased collagen fiber accumulation in the substantia nigra. The authors performed pathology examination after long-term PD treatment with l-3,4-dihydroxyphenylalanine (L-DOPA), levodopa/carbidopa ([l]{.smallcaps}-dopa/carbidopa), and biperiden. According to the histopathology examination, the patient showed loss of pigmented neurons and significant fiber accumulation in the substantia nigra. After the initiation of dopamine agonist, [l]{.smallcaps}-dopa/carbidopa, and biperiden, the extracellular accumulation of collagen fibers was slightly increased. To our knowledge, this is the first report of the accumulation of collagen fibers in the substantia nigra of patients with PD and its pathomechanism. Histopathology is one of the most reliable methods for determining the pathological features of the brain. However, the normal range of collagen fibers in the substantia nigra has not been clearly established. Although there are a limited number of clinical reports describing the pathology of PD patients, their clinical courses vary considerably. Therefore, further investigations using pathology and clinical
