Dyce syndrome: facial dysmorphism, neck, shoulder, and spine abnormalities. The Dyce syndrome is a genetically heterogeneous disorder. It is considered an autosomal recessive syndrome, with a nearly normal intelligence. Ophthalmologic abnormalities, polydactyly, cleft palate, or syndactyly were not found in the present patient, suggesting that the number of the mutation of Dyce syndrome is at least two. Hypertelorism, wide nasal bridge, downward-slanting palpebral fissures, dental crowding, small jaw, a high-arched palate with small upper incisors and a well-developed maxilla, a small chin, and shoulder and pelvic deformities are other major characteristics of this syndrome. However, the genetical heterogeneity of the Dyce syndrome, the effect of the environmental factors on the phenotypic expression, and an increased number of the mutations or a mutation of another gene remain to be clarified. Solvothermal synthesis of SnO₂ thin-films on granular activated carbon for dye-sensitized solar cells. SnO₂ thin-films were deposited on granular activated carbon (GAC) via a solvothermal method. SEM, XRD, and element analysis results indicated that SnO₂ with a thin-film thickness of 7 nm grew almost uniformly on GAC. The photovoltaic performance of dye-sensitized solar cells was improved to
