The selectivity of cortical neurons in response to current-inputs reflects the inputs they receive and is the basis of a cortical process called 'current-input selectivity'. This principle could be restricted to direction-selectivity if only unidirectional, current inputs are received, e.g., through one moving object. Here, we show that the cortical neurons in the primary visual cortex of cats (19 recordings) form cortical directional selectivity from current-input selectivity for moving gratings. The cortical directional selectivity exists for both stationary and moving gratings. The neurons also show current-input selectivity for moving gratings, although the current-input selectivity itself is limited to a single moving direction. These results suggest that the cortical neurons use the dynamic characteristics of the animal's eyes to form cortical directional selectivity.Q: Has the Reformation cured the abuses of the Anabaptists? I think Anabaptists are being very unfair to the Protestant Reformation. They are certainly very critical of it, and say it was an Anabaptist movement 04aeff104c
