The actual image creation power of Photoshop and Elements is, of course, not limited to Elements applications. The power that makes Elements such a good choice for hobbyists is its extremely simple interface, not only about its special categories and tools, but also greatly simplified appearance. Additionally, the program can easily adapt to the hardware platform of the user (despite the fact Lightroom still requires much more RAM to be effective, for example). More surprisingly, Photoshop Elements isn't just an Editor. You can use it to create Photo Books, web galleries, CD-ROMS and Photo Frames. It's pretty amazing. ABOVE: A closeup view of some of the iPad Pro's cameras, all of which are on the rear of the device. In my case, the camera on my iPhone camera has the largest aperture. BELOW: A photo taken with the Apple Pencil on Adobe Photoshop Elements on the iPad Pro. The photo was created in a Google Cloud Document with the "square" pencil icon. Photoshop Elements may be the most available choice, depending on your hardware requirements. But I prefer the Creative Cloud versions of them both. Lightroom is great and can function well in a limited partition, but I find frequent crashes (especially if you're using it on a Mac) a distraction. Lightroom for the Macintosh remains my favorite program today. On Advertisements One of the greatest strengths of Photoshop Elements is its performances in the marketplace. That its new price point appeals to the iPhone crowd is not surprising. There is something very appealing about the iPhone as an artistic and artistic medium. It's both small and easy to use. A good thing I can now photograph with my phone, even using the High Quality Camera mode. This mode, available through the camera app on your iPhone, increases the quality of what you can expect to download (after you've chosen High Quality to download), but it also increases the file sizes. One of the things I like about this mode is the ability to create a Quicktime movie around the image. You can do this through the "create movie" button right in the camera.
