He also dives into how PSD is a native app, and how he learned to debug the WebAssembly JavaScript code. He talks about the state of PSD on other browsers, and gives an overview of the JavaScript things in Photoshop that are impossible to debug on other browsers such as IE. The web is now the first consistent environment for using online apps. It has learned to adapt to our environments, and the browsers have learned what users want. Through all of this, it feels like our world will never be the same, but it is. In fact, that's still true. It's a new world, and we never stop being amazed by the new worlds we create. The old metaphors no longer seem so right, and at first, we hate them. But we keep coming back.

Android Studio-style workspace. It makes working with images easy, by allowing powerful image editing and color correction tools that otherwise would have required loads of work. The Elements workspace was developed in-house, and can be purchased as an in-app purchase. The Elements workspace is very similar to the one found in InDesign. And as a welcome addition to the toolkit, you'll see some of the long-requested improvements to the content-aware filling and object removal tools.
