Getting started

The only real downside to my reviewing process is that I'll inevitably make mistakes. Every time I make a determination, I'm never quite certain if I've made a mistake or if it's actually just a different way to do the same thing. For example, you may know that you know that you can adjust the contrast in a RAW file and, in doing so, you'll get a ton of flat shading added while, under certain conditions, not others, it could add soft-focus. This is because of a bug in the program. I'll say this again - even with this down-arrow you get out of the box, the program still is in many ways a work-in-progress. With time, it will get better, but in the interim, users will need to rely on efficient, intelligent use of the tools that they have. As such, I have no doubt that the existing tools will be refined. However, at the same time, it's important to maintain a sense of awe and wonder at how far the program has come in the last few years.
