Upon running the application for the 20th time, you notice the usual performance improvement, but this time it looked like when Lightroom can open a folder it first caches the contents of that folder. This was a pleasant surprise: the application loads considerably faster, but there was a downside: the cache was wiped clean if you open a new folder and import a batch of photos from that folder. Off course, this can be easily addressed by creating a backup of this cache before updating the database or visiting the folder. There are only two bugs related to this release we are aware of, and they are both the same: one, that it would not import files from a Libre Office file, which is quite odd, but the second, that imported RAW files would always show as.psd logs. Disregard that one: they are intended and it is safe to leave them. And the “no crash” bug? We think that this one is more of a Qt regression. You see, we created a relatively simple graphic with Alpha Channels, and let Lightroom try to work with this: it worked and both the foreground and background image would be in Alpha mode. Fertile grounds for corruption! Photography Editor 7.0.1 is available now.
