If I define the following C# classes: public class A { } public class B : A { } Will the two share the same memory, as the only difference is that A is abstract and B is not? A: It is not the same memory, yes. The abstract base class is completely ignored, and the derived class will be placed in the same memory block as the instance of the derived class. A: Not at all. The default (in.NET) is that derived classes will not include references to the base class. Also, the generated class will usually be generated to be a private nested class with that name, so it's just a normal class with a different namespace. If you use a friend class with in the base class you'll most likely still get a reference to the base class. Note that if you put B on the heap you could share the A instance. But that is not recommended. Q: Перевод шрифта в правильной атрибуции Вот сайт: Сейчас шрифт при адаптивности растягивается:
